INTRODUCTION

Nowadays we see women working in so many sectors. We can clearly see that women are fighting for their rights they are excelling in whatever work they are doing be it politics, education sector, sports etc. they are going hand in hand with men mostly. They are having more rights for their safety, employment, better standard of living their contribution to the society is more but that was not the case few years back. Initially, women's contributions to society have usually not been considered among conventional scholars of history, their importance has largely remained unnoticed. It is an effort to reproduce the dynamic, changing environment of the Mughal Empire from the time Babur became emperor to the beginning of the 18th century, which marked the end of Aurangzeb's reign, as Ira Mukhoty explains in the introduction of her book. This spans a period of almost two hundred years.

This was carefully recorded how women's lives and accomplishments influenced the Mughal Empire and the emperors who ruled there. The older matriarchs include mothers and aunts like Hisar Daulat Begum, Khanzada Begum, Dildar Begum, Gul Badan Begum, Maham Begum, and Bega Begum, experienced the most important all throughout the beginning of the Mughal empire. When Akbar, aged just thirteen years old, succeeded as king, several "milk mothers" or foster mothers, particularly Jiji Anaga and Maham Anaga, gained importance. Later, when the emperors solidified control in their spreading of the kingdom, their wives gained prominence. So, in addition to the well-known Noor Jahan and Mumtaz Mahal, there was Harkha Bai and Salma Sultan Begum. Finally, as the empire began to effectively emerge, unmarried daughters like Jahanara Begum and Roshanara Begum emerged at the forefront. Zeb-un-Nisa, Begum-un-Nisa the brilliant daughters of Aurangzeb, are the last greatest of women in the Mughal empire. Babur and Humayun, the first Mughals, held great regard for the clan's matriarchs—their mothers and grandmothers—whose guidance frequently brought feuding brothers together.

Not only they had impacted the emperors politically but they had a great influence over the harem which was under women's control where they had made their own set of rules there, and the power they enjoyed was immense. Not only just this some women were great writers as well who had written extensively about a reign for instance if we take an example and look at Humayun Nama was written by Gulbadan Begum who wrote in detail about the reign of Humayun the administration, about the harem, but also the information of Babur as well was there. We cannot just only look at the royal Mughal women's impacts but there were common women who were of importance and they played important roles in art, poetry, and writing as well we cannot forget the role, they played in medicine like helping give birth, etc. They were also present in the courts for the purpose of dance and music for entertainment purposes which was there and they were respected as well by everyone. There is also information about how the women of both religions Hindu and Muslims were treated by the society. What were their roles in the religious rituals and the bhakti and Sufi movements as well? What was the situation of the education they were getting they were allowed to get it but with some restrictions on them as they had for the pilgrimage, they could not go on to a pilgrimage alone. They had abortifacients for the women who wanted to terminate their pregnancies. But it was taboo to discuss it openly. Overall, the women had a great impact on the Mughal empire and the role they played was important in establishing and running the empire. The research was incomplete without taking help from secondary sources like articles, books, research papers, etc. which are already there on the topic I could take important information from those.

WOMEN'S SOCIAL STATUSi. Overview of The Social Hierarchy

The Mughal Empire became characterized by way of a complex social hierarchy that changed primarily based on caste, religion, and profession. on the top of the hierarchy have been the rulers and nobility, who enjoyed extensive political and monetary power. Under them have been the merchant class and the peasantry, who occupied several positions inside the financial system and society. Women's roles inside the Mughal social hierarchy had been largely decided with the aid of their circle of relative historical past and caste. Aristocratic women were often knowledgeable and enjoyed substantial cultural and social effects. But they have been additionally subject to strict social norms that limited their mobility and autonomy. Ladies from decreased castes and classes had fewer opportunities for education and were regularly relegated to domestic roles.

The Mughal social hierarchy became structured across the idea of purity and pollution, which played a substantial function in shaping women's roles in society. They had been seen as a source of purity and had been reputable however from time to time they were seen as an amusement item within the aristocratic society. Standard, women inside the Mughal Empire occupied a complicated and varied social popularity that became formed by a selection of things along with caste, religion, and gender norms. At the same time as some women enjoyed sizeable cultural and social effects, many others had been concerned with strict social norms and limited opportunities for schooling and participation in public lifestyles.

ii. Societal Contrast of Women

Throughout the Mughal Empire, there have been sizable differences in the status of Hindu and Muslim women. Those differences have been largely shaped by means of religious and cultural elements, as well as the social and political context of the time. In standard, Muslim women at some point in the Mughal Empire enjoyed a better reputation than their Hindu opposite numbers. This was partially because Islam provided girls with greater legal and social protections than Hinduism. Muslim girls have been entitled to inherit assets and had greater rights in marriage and divorce than Hindu women.

Muslim women additionally had extra opportunities for education and participation in public lifestyles than Hindu girls. They could attend spiritual schools and emerge as pupils, poets, and writers. a few Muslim ladies even held positions of political and economic strength. Then again, Hindu ladies have been frequently concerned with strict social norms and practices that restricted their autonomy and opportunities. For example, the practice of sati, or self-immolation, became common amongst Hindu ladies, specifically among the top class. Child marriage became additionally time-honored among Hindu communities, and widows had been frequently ostracized and denied inheritance rights.

On average, at the same time as there had been variations within the reputation of Hindu and Muslim women throughout the Mughal Empire, both organizations of girls confronted substantial demanding situations and constraints in phrases in their social and political repute. but Muslim women loved positive criminal and social protections that Hindu girls did now not, which gave them a higher repute in lots of respects.

iii. Access To Property and The Inheritance

Women's access to assets and inheritance throughout the Mughal Empire became determined with the aid of a complicated set of legal and cultural elements. The Mughal Empire was characterized by a patriarchal social structure, wherein men held most of the financial and political energy. This made it difficult for women to access assets and inheritance rights, as those were often tied to male possession and control. However, there had been a few legal provisions that allowed women to inherit belongings and keep some diploma of economic independence. Under Islamic regulation, which turned into the criminal machine of the Mughal Empire, women have been entitled to inherit assets from their fathers, husbands, and different male spouse and children. This intended that widows and daughters may want to inherit land, homes, and other varieties of property.

In practice, however, women's access to assets and inheritance became frequently constrained by cultural and social norms that favored guys. Many women were unable to claim their rightful inheritance because of pressure from male households, who may have seen women's inheritance as a risk to their very own financial and social repute. Women from aristocratic families had extra possibilities to inherit property and hold some diploma of monetary independence. Some women even held positions of power and influence inside the imperial courtroom, which allowed them to gather and hold giant amounts of wealth. Usually, women's access to property and inheritance throughout the Mughal Empire became shaped by using a variety of legal, cultural, and social elements. even though women had some legal protections that allowed them to inherit assets, these rights have been regularly constrained in practice with the aid of patriarchal norms and practices. But a few women had been able to navigate these constraints and acquire a diploma of financial independence and social fame.

iv. Child Marriage And Widdow Remarriage

Throughout the Mughal Empire, child marriage became a generic exercise throughout distinctive communities and religions, especially among the upper classes. The exercise of child marriage involved marrying off young women, now and again as younger as six- or seven years vintage, to older guys. This change into accomplished for a variety of social, financial, and political motives, which include cementing alliances among families, securing dowry bills, and making sure of the purity of family bloodlines. Child marriage had a profound effect on the lives of women and younger girls, as it often intended that they had been compelled to depart their houses and families at a younger age, and subjected to domestic and sexual violence by way of their older husbands. child brides had been also much more likely to die in childbirth or be afflicted by bad health effects due to their young age and absence of reproductive maturity.

Widow remarriage, however, becomes an unusual exercise during the Mughal Empire. Widows had been regularly considered a burden on their families and groups and had been subjected to social and economic marginalization. In some instances, widows were even compelled to devote sati, or self-immolation, as a way of preserving the honor and recognition of their families. regardless of the social and cultural constraints on widow remarriage, there have been some instances of widows remarrying at some point in the Mughal duration. This changed into greater not unusual among lower-class and peasant girls, who have been much less sure by means of the social norms and practices of the aristocratic lessons.

The Mughal emperors themselves played a vast role in shaping the practices of child marriage and widow remarriage all through their reign. A few emperors, which includes Akbar, sought to restrict the practice of child marriage and promote widow remarriage as a manner of empowering girls and difficult patriarchal norms. However, those efforts had been regularly limited in scope and had little impact on broader social practices. Typical, the superiority of child marriage and the limited practice of widow remarriage at some point in the Mughal Empire meditated the deeply patriarchal and hierarchical nature of Mughal society. These practices had a profound effect on the lives of ladies and women and endured to form gender members of the family inside the region for hundreds of years to come back.
